Whether long-term exposure to plastic materials affects cultured tumor cells is unknown. We studied the metabolic and redox status of neuroblastoma cells cultured on or subjacent to plastic surfaces. Two human neuroblastoma cell lines and a rat neuroblastoma cell line were used. The cellular ATP levels decreased after incubation for 4 days with polyethylene (PEX) and polyvinylchloride (PVC) in a dose-dependent manner. By contrast, they increased after incubation with glass. After 4 days, the rate of oxygen consumption was increased in cells on PEX at 24 degrees C and in cells on PVC at 37 degrees C, whereas the rate was unchanged in cells on glass. The superoxide dismutase activity increased in cells cultured on PEX or PVC, suggesting that exposure to plastic may induce oxidative stress. Conversely, the catalase activity decreased, and glutathione peroxidase activity increased in cells cultured on PEX and PVC, suggesting that exposure to plastic may induce oxidative stress. In vitro, the ATP content and the oxygen consumption rate of tumor cells were higher in cells grown on plastic materials than in those grown in controls, whereas no difference was observed in vivo. These findings suggest that in vitro exposure to plastic materials significantly alters tumor cell bioenergetics and redox homeostasis.You are here Harrison Township pond cleanup slated May 22 The Harrison Township Board of Supervisors plans to break ground for the completion of a nearly $1 million project that will increase the fish 82138339de
