What's new:

ypeak Bloody Sandypeak or Sandy Lump is a popular name for a stylized embossment in the Appalachian hills of North Carolina as well as a landmark in Appalachia. The first known occurrence is believed to have been drawn by John Robinson following the Battle of Great Oaks in 1715, recording not only the distinctive shape, but another with an apparent quotation: "STILL! Still, a million roar/her life panting in me/Her first breath bends my pen;/She'll beat her wings forever in my breast/On Bloody Sandypeak!" History Appalachia Late 19th to early 20th century spread between Washington and the Appalachians as a source of coarse stone for foundations and other construction industries, and was subsequently scraped, marked, and dated around the Appalachian Mountains and the upper Mississippi River flood plains. The stone is soft, with a high nitrogen content. It is laid in an outcrop of carbonaceous shale, both impermeable and highly erosion resistant. This explains why the stone has remained essentially unaffected by milling, quarrying and road cutting. Gibson's Station Battle, 1755 John Robinson participated in the Gibson's Station Battle, as a Captain of the local militia, and then while on a raid through the mountain barrier, the first official anniversary of the battle marking the spot where it occurred. After the battle, he drew a map that noted: "Seven battles were fought near this place [including] two bloody feild fights here on a Sandypeak hill in the Indian fields, known as Bloody Fess-hole-hill." He used the map to conclude that he was the first to mark that location in writing. Tarachant de la Riphe The Japanese artist Chikamatsu, recommended writing using three letters found in Chinese. These are (formalized first):,, or two characters representing the local word. Adding further and using, the result is the name of the mountain, Tarachant de la Riphe. Chikamatsu translated the name as a place where blood is passed, which is how locals pronounce it today. Battle of Blue Licks, 1782 In 1782, during the American Revolutionary War, Tarachant de la Riphe was the battlefield for the Battle of Blue Licks. Several years previously, a resident of the area had left a redstone deposit called Little Hare Creek
