A morphological study was performed on the rat thyroid, its substructures and on the experimental carcinomata obtained. It was shown, that after thyroidectomy, or subtotal resection and autotransplantation, the remaining thyroid tissue undergoes a benign hyperplasia, which is a kind of the regenerative reaction. The carcinoma-like structure may develop in this thyroid tissue, and the entire experimental carcinoma may be localized in the grafts only. In the near future, bioprinted kidneys will be a common sight in hospital intensive care units. Harvard researchers have developed a new 3D-printed kidney structure—made from biocompatible polymers—that can be surgically implanted into the body. The kidney is able to use oxygen and glucose for energy, and the cells can form flexible tissue, which then maintains a human-like shape. The research, published this week in the journal Nature Biotechnology, is just one small
