A: You can actually use the a print statement in a library. Here is an example: from dviread import DViread read_file = DViread(output_path, file="file_to_read.txt", is_ascii=False) read_file.print_text() The test.txt contains: Hello World The result of the run: Hello World A: Essentially, a text file can be represented by a list of lines. Each line is comprised of: starts with a line character (usually either " " or " ") followed by the line number; followed by the line text; followed by either a newline character (usually either " " or "\r"), a carriage return character (usually either "\r" or " "), or a linefeed character (usually either " " or "\r" followed by " " (a space) as the end of the line. Here's an example file, test.txt: 1 Line 1. 2 Line 2. 3 Line 3. 4 Line 4. The following is how it could be read from a file and output to a Python string: with open("test.txt", "r") as input: output = "" for line_num, line_text in enumerate(input): line = line_text.strip() if line.startswith(" "): output += "Line %d. " % line_num else: output += line + " " if line.startswith(" "): output += "Line %d. " % (line_num + 1) print(output) The result: Line 1. Line 2. Line 3. Line 4. Or, as a list: with open("test.txt", "r") as input: 1cdb36666d
