What's It All About? The buzzword in Adobe's creative and marketing group for 2016 was 'dynamic'. The message to creatives, and agencies, was that as soon as an idea had been baked in the oven, get it out of the oven. But then, as the trends continued, out came 'dynamic trends'. For the first time in 16 years, PAD and creative teams traded that weekly ritual of the ice bucket challenge for a global movement for social good, triggering a series of 'dynamic moments' in the creative sphere.

Conceptually built as much around 'place' as 'process', Snapchat has been quite a sleeper in terms of live-streaming success. But that's changing as it slashes the payments it makes to its creators. In fact, the seemingly unlikely cable channel, the creators' new-age streaming service — dedicated to 'pop culture, art and everyday life' — has taken off so quickly that, within just two weeks of launching, it had signed on comedian Andy Samberg, actor Jesse Eisenberg and director Judd Apatow, amongst others. The first thing you realise about Snapchat is that this mobile app is almost completely obsolete — not that it's a smartphone product like Instagram, but a software that is accessed on any device that can have a camera. Brands are increasingly using what is called augmented reality to bring consumers into the product. And the creators, Snapchat, is leading the way. Of course, the destination for this app is still the app itself. But the virtual trinkets that are popping up all over the place, from the Channel 4 comedy Love Island to Marvel's new emoji, speak volumes about the direction the content is going in. What's not yet clear, though, is how long the buzz around augmented reality will last. In
