Hypothermia improves clinical outcome after cardiac surgery, and magnesium may prolong graft patency. We assessed the effects of intensive treatment with hypothermic and magnesium-supplemented cardiopulmonary bypass (CPB) on brain function after open heart surgery. One hundred thirty patients were randomly allocated to intensive hypothermia (mean temperature: 24.4 degrees C) with and without magnesium supplementation during CPB. The 24-hour postoperative functional outcome was assessed with the composite of seven postoperative neuropsychological variables (Composite Score). The intensive hypothermic and magnesium-supplemented group showed a significantly better composite score than the hypothermia group did. Postoperative morbidity was not improved by the intensive hypothermic and magnesium-supplemented regimen. Intensive hypothermia and magnesium supplementation may improve the outcome after open heart surgery. Kinetics of the in vitro metabolism
