Ex-Im Bank Insists It Has No Place in Trump's Trade Agenda (Bloomberg) -- The American Export-Import Bank says it has been clear all along that it doesn't fit into President Donald Trump's plan to reshape U.S. trade, so why are key Trump administration officials continuing to insist the agency does still have a place in the administration's strategy? In the latest sign that things are getting more confusing inside the government's approach to U.S. trade policy, White House National Trade Council Director Peter Navarro and top officials at the U.S. Trade Representative's Office are engaged in a dispute over the Export-Import Bank's continued existence. This fight started as soon as the administration took office and was reignited by a media furor over Trump's comments about the bank in the wake of the presidential election. The controversy has continued as Trump has backed away from some of his campaign pledges, including leaving the Export-Import Bank, and as some of the administration's more hawkish voices have been accused of misusing information provided by the bank. "The bureaucracy within Commerce is working against the Export-Import Bank," complained Christopher Morris, the U.S. trade representative's spokesman, at a press briefing in January. Now, several people close to the situation told Bloomberg that part of Navarro's mission is to ensure that the Export-Import Bank is part of the administration's trade agenda. Trump has repeatedly said he wants to do away with the bank, which helps finance the purchase of American-made goods and services by foreign buyers and is a favorite target of the hard-right Freedom Caucus members of Congress. The National Economic Council helped found the Export-Import Bank in the 1950s. One of the agency's tenets is to finance exports -- in other words, to export American goods and services around the
