also, there has been some discussion on the mesa issue tracker regarding the ability to use the new 'discrete gpu' option in `dri_prime=1` with wayland. it seems that the `dri_prime=1` option causes problems for wayland, but this can be worked around by adding a line to your `/etc/gdm/init/default` file: you can also write a shell script or a batch file, or call it from eclipse itself. if you try to run the script in the native messaging host, you get a `could not find the main class'sun.tools.javac.main'` error. that's because, in the native messaging host, the script is run as `sun.main`, but on windows, the `rt.jar` library that provides the `sun.main` is not in the current directory. that's why you need to provide the path to the jre installation directory. for a while now, mesa bytes has been the preferred name of my project, but i had a hard time getting it accepted for a name on the parallels desktop site. it was just a simple project that did a small thing, so that's what i've had in mind for a while now. if set, error messages are printed to `stderr`. for example, if the application generates a `gl_invalid_enum` error, a corresponding error message indicating where the error occurred, and possibly why, will be printed to `stderr`. for release builds, `mesa_debug` defaults to off (no debug output). `mesa_debug` accepts the following comma-separated list of named flags, which adds extra behavior to just set `mesa_debug` to 1:
